Songs of this Soil focuses on the leadership status quo of the country. This performance interrogates the role of religious leaders in the democratic South Africa. People from economically ostracised communities, are desperate for economic transformation, and find it difficult to move forward within the modern world. Unmute, a premier South African arts company, has set up a platform for the display of collaborative artistic works by artists with mixed abilities; with or without disabilities; and from mixed genres (music, drama and visual art).

The company participated in the Artscape Incubator Programme, where they gained skills in arts administration skills; understanding how to plan activities properly; budgeting; understanding company structure/organograms; bookkeeping; writing proposals; and planning events. In addition to this, Unmute will become a fully-fledged in-house company at Artscape.

Unmute, through project funding from Artscape, will be hosting their annual Annual ArtsAbility Festival of artistic workshops/ creations and collaborations during the International Week of Disability. This pioneering integrated arts festival became a reality in 2013 after a performance of Unmute – the first ensemble choreographed piece by Andile Vellem. This performance was based on Andile's experience as a deaf dancer who had been dancing professionally for more than 13 years. Unmute was a way for Andile to find his voice as a choreographer. Using Sign Language as the source of the movement vocabulary, he brought together artists from different backgrounds to find and explore what they would like to unmute – whether it was feelings, perceptions, social norms or expectations – while endeavouring to deconstruct what society perceived as dance. After a successful run of the Unmute production, the company was incepted in 2014.

For the past two years, Unmute has also been a regular participating company at Artscape's Annual Rural Outreach Project.
